Season of Fruits

It's May, and it's the season of fruits. Thailand is a veritable Asian "fruit bowl" and this is underscored by the "fruit fairs" held across the country this month.

A walk in any Thai public market will surely astonish the visitor. Such variety of Thai fruits! Aside from the familiar apples, oranges, grapes, mangoes, pineapples and guavas, other fruits of different shapes and colors are on display in almost every street corner. This cornucopia contributes to the peculiarity of sights and smell that is characteristically Thailand.

The durian, considered the "King of Fruits" and perhaps one of the most expensive fruits in the world, grows abundantly in Thailand. Its peak season starts in April, but it is available almost the whole year round.

Then, there's the papaya or "malako." Originally from Mexico, raw papaya is shredded and mixed with dried shrimps, vinegar, garlic, fish sauce, sugar, lime and chillies to produce "samtam", Thailand's famous salad.

But bananas are perhaps the most abundant of all Thailand's fruits. The country has about 20 varieties, ranging from fragrant sweet little "finger bananas" to large specimens with thicker golden skins.

And ah, the jackfruit or "khanoon," a green-yellow large thorny fruit. Peeled and seeded, inside it is packed with yellow, sweet fibrous meat that is pure heaven for the palate.

The pomelo or "som-oh" resembles an over-sized grapefruit with a thick, greenish-white skin. It is usually peeled and eaten in segments. It even tastes a little like a grapefruit.

Another popular fruit is the Thai custard apple (noi-na). Its horny, green exterior does not do justice to the sweet meat inside, though this has to be extracted from countless black pips. This fruit is grown mainly in the Northeast and its season runs from June to September.

Bunches of longan (lamyai) arrive at markets from the North during June-August. Extremely sweet inside, longans are Thailand's most valuable export items.

The red-skinned lychees (linchi) are a favorite from April to June. Grown mainly in the North, they are sweet with a slightly acid taste.

The country also produces massive quantities of pineapples (sapparat) many of which are canned. Grown all-year round, the Thai pineapple is generally much sweeter than its counterparts anywhere else in the world, except probably Philippine pineapples available throughout the year.

The Thai rose apple (chomphoo) is a bell-shaped fruit with a mushy texture and slightly acid taste. Available from June to September.

Another fruit that is very popular with visitors is the Thai mangosteen (mang-khut). Inside the thick maroon-colored skin are small, white and extremely sweet. Available from May to September.

And there's more. The rambutan, watermelon, coconut, orange, strawberry, pomegranate, plum, cantaloupe, passion fruit, star fruit and many others.

Try any of these fruit during your stay in the Kingdom, and you'll have tasted the real Thailand.
